Re-imagining God

Richard Kearney

I come in the little things, saith the Lord

—Evelyn Underhill

God, if God exists, exists not just for God but for us. And the manner in which God comes to us, comes to mind, comes to be and to dwell as flesh amongst us, is deeply informed by the manner in which we think about God—in short, how we interpret, narrate and imagine God. This, I suggest, calls for a philosophical hermeneutics instructed by the various and essential ways in which God “appears” to us in and through “phenomena,” and “signals” to us in and through “signs.” It is my wager in this essay that one of the most telling ways in which the infinite comes to be experienced and imagined by finite minds is as possibility—that is, as the ability to be. Even, and especially, when such possibility seems impossible to us.

But let us be clear from the outset: I am not saying this is the only way, or even the most primordial way—just that it is a very telling way, and one which has been largely neglected in the history of western metaphysics and theology in favor of categories like substance, cause, actuality, omnipotence, absolute spirit, or sufficient reason. So I am not proposing posse as some newly discovered (or recovered) Master Word—some extraordinary Meta-Code which might unlock the ancient Secret of divine nature or naming. God forbid! Our proposal is far more modest than that—namely, a tentative exercise in poetic conjecture about a certain overlooked aspect of divinity, seeking guidance on the way from phenomenological description and hermeneutic interpretation.

I will proceed by means of three concentric circles—scriptural, testimonial and literary. Traversing this threefold “variation of imagination,” I hope to identify some key characteristics of the God of the possible as it reveals itself to us poetically.

The Scriptural Circle

My efforts to rethink God as posse draw primarily from the biblical message that what is impossible for us is possible for God. This latter notion of mesthetic possibility is evident in many Scriptural passages. In Mark 10, for example, we are told that while entry to the Kingdom seems impossible for humans, all things are made possible by God. The exact text reads: “For humans it is impossible but not for God; because for God everything is possible (panta gar dunata para toi Theo)” (Mark 10:27). In similar vein, we are told in St. John’s prologue that our ability to become sons of God in the Kingdom is something made possible by God: “Light shone in darkness and to all who received it was given the possibility (dunamis) to become sons of God.” The term dunamis is crucial and can be translated either as power or possibility—a semantic ambivalence to which we shall return below. Further evocations of the possibiliz-ing power (dunamis pneumatos) of the Spirit are evidenced in Paul’s letters to the Corinthians and Romans; but perhaps most dramatically of all in the Annunciation scene where Mary is told by the angel that the dunamis of God will overshadow her, and that she will bear the son of God—“for nothing is impossible (adunatẽei) with God” (Luke 1:35–37).

In all these examples, divinity—as Father, Son, or Spirit—is described as a possibilizing of divine love and logos in the order of human history where it would otherwise have been impossible. In other words, the divine reveals itself here as the possibility of the Kingdom—or if you prefer to cite a via negativa, as the impossibility of impossibility.

A hermeneutical poetics of the kingdom looks to some of the recurring figures—metaphors, parables, images, symbols—deployed in the gospels to communicate the eschatological promise. The first thing one notes is that these figures almost invariably refer to a God of “small things”—to borrow from the wonderful title of Arundhati Roy’s novel. Not only do we have the association of the Kingdom with the vulnerable openness and trust of “little children,” as in the Mark 10 passage cited above (vv. 13–16), but we also have the images of the yeast in the flour (Luke 13:20–21), the tiny pearl of invaluable price (Matthew 13:45–46), and perhaps most suggestive and telling of all, that of the mustard seed (Mark 4:30–32)—a minuscule grain that blooms and flourishes into a capacious tree. The kingdom of God, this last text tells us, is Re-imagining God

"like a mustard seed that, when it is sown in the ground, is the smallest of all the seeds on the earth. But once it is sown, it springs up and becomes the largest of plants and puts forth large branches, so that the birds of the sky can dwell in its shade."

One might be tempted to call this recurring motif of the kingdom as the last or least or littlest of things—a microtheology to the extent that it resists the standard macrotheology of the Kingdom as emblem of sovereignty, omnipotence and ecclesiastical triumph. The frequent reference in the gospels to the judgment of the Kingdom being related to how we respond in history, here and now, to the "least of these," elakhiston, is crucial (e.g., Matthew 25:40). The loving renunciation of absolute power by Christ’s emptying (kenosis) of the Godhead, so as to assume the most humble form of humanity (the last and least of beings), is echoed by the eschatological reminder that it is easier for the defenseless and powerless to enter the Kingdom than the rich and mighty. And I think it is telling—as Dostoevsky reminds us in the Grand Inquisitor episode of the Brothers Karamazov—that the greatest temptation that Christ must overcome, after his forty days in the desert, is the will to become master and possessor of the universe. This is a temptation he faces again and again right up to his transfiguration on Mt. Tabor, when his disciples want to apotheosize and crown him by building a cult temple there on the mountain (Luke 9). Instead, Christ proceeds to a second kenotic act of giving, refusing the short route to immediate triumph and embracing the via crucis which demonstrates what it means for the seed to die before it is reborn as a flowering tree which hosts all living creatures. As "King," he enters Jerusalem not with conquering armies but "seated upon an ass’s colt" (John 12). He upturns the inherited hierarchies of power, fulfilling the prophecy of Isaiah that he would bring justice to the world, not by "shouting aloud in the street," but as a "bruised reed" that will not break, and "a smoldering wick" that will not quench (Isaiah 42:1–4).

But in addition to these spatial metaphors of the Kingdom exemplified by little things—yeast, a mustard seed, a pearl, a reed, an infant, the "least of these"—a hermeneutic poetics of the Kingdom might also look to the temporal figures of eschatology. These invariably take the form of a certain achronicity. I am thinking here of the numerous references to the fact that even though the Kingdom has already come—and is incarnate here and now in the loving gestures of Christ and all those who give, or receive, a cup of water—it still always remains a possibility yet to come. This is what Emanuel Levinas calls the "paradox of posterior anteriorty"; and it is cogently illustrated in an aphorism of Walter Benjamin which combines the spatial figure of the portal with the eschatological figure of futurity: "This future does not correspond to homogenous empty time; because at the heart of every moment of the future is contained the little door through which the Messiah may enter." ¹

As "eternal," the kingdom transcends all chronologies of time. Christ indicates this when he affirms that "before Abraham was, I am" (John 8:58), and when he promises a Second Coming when he will return again. In short, the Kingdom is: (1) already there as historical possibility, and (2) not yet there as historically realized kingdom “come on earth.” This is why we choose to translate the canonical theophany to Moses on Mt. Sinai (esher ayeh esher), not as “I am who am” (ego sum qui sum), but as “I am who may be” (Exodus 3:14). God is saying something like this: I will show up as promised, but I cannot be in time and history, I cannot become fully embodied in the flesh of the world, unless you show up and answer my call “Where are you?” with the response “Here I am.” (I explore this eschatological enigma of time in further detail in my concluding remarks, below.)
Richard Kearney

The Testimonial Circle

Our second hermeneutic circle explores a poetics of the Kingdom in light of a number of religious writers down through the ages, in what we might call the testimonial or confessional genre. Unlike “metaphysical” thinkers who presuppose an ontological priority of actuality over possibility, these more “poetical” minds reverse the traditional priority and point to a new category of possibility—divine possibility—beyond the traditional opposition between the possible and the impossible.

Let me begin with the pregnant maxim of Angelus Silesius: “God is possible as the more than impossible.” Here Silesius—a German mystical thinker often cited by Heidegger and Derrida—points toward an eschatological notion of possibility which might be said to transcend the three conventional concepts of the possible as: (1) an epistemological category of modal logic, along with necessity and actuality (Kant); (2) a substantialist category of potentia that lacks its fulfillment as actus (Aristotle, the scholastics); and (3) a rationalist category of possibilitas conceived as a representation of the mind (Leibniz, the idealists). All such categories fall within the old metaphysical dualism of possibility versus impossibility. But Silesius intimates a new role for the possible as a ludic and liberal outpouring of divine play:

God is possible as the more than impossible . . .
God plays with Creation
All that is play that the deity gives itself
It has imagined the creature for its pleasure.

Creation here is depicted as an endless giving of possibility which calls us toward the Kingdom.

I think the early medieval Jewish commentator, Rashi, also had something like this in mind when he interprets Isaiah’s God calling to his creatures—“I cannot be God unless you are my witnesses.” He takes this to mean: “I am the God who will be whenever you bear witness to love and justice in the world.”2 And I believe that the Holocaust victim Etty Hillesum was gesturing toward a similar notion when, just weeks before her death in a concentration camp, she wrote: “You God cannot help us but we must help you and defend your dwelling place inside us to the last.” Both Rashi and Hillesum were witnessing to the dynamis of God as the power of the powerless. This, clearly, is not the imperial power of a sovereign; it is a dynamic call to love which posabilizes and enables humans to transform their world—by giving itself to the “least of these,” by empathizing with the disinherit and the dispossessed, by refusing the path of might and violence, by transfiguring the mustard seed into the kingdom, each moment at a time, one act after another, each step of the way. This is the path heralded by the Pauline God of “nothings and nobodies” (ta mé onta) excluded from the triumphal preeminence of totality (ta onta) a kenotic, self-emptying, crucified God whose “weakness is stronger than human strength” (1 Corinthians 1:25, 28). It signals the option for the poor, for nonviolent resistance and revolution taken by peacemakers and dissenting “holy fools” from ancient to modern times. It is the message of suffering rather than doing evil, of loving one’s adversaries, of “no enemies,” of “soul force” (satyagraha). One thinks of a long heritage ranging from Isaiah, Jesus, Siddhartha and Socrates, to such contemporary figures as Gandhi, Václav Havel, Dorothy Day, Jean Vanier, Ernesto Cardenal, Tich Nhat Hahn and Martin Luther King. The God witnessed here goes beyond the will-to-power.

Nicholas of Cusa offers some interesting insights into this eschatological God when he declares that “God alone is all he is able to be.” Unlike the God of metaphysical omnipotence, underlying the perverse logic of theodicy which seeks to justify evil as part of the divine will, this notion of God as an “abiding to be” (posse or possest) points in a radically different direction. Let us pause for a moment to unpack the phrase, “God is all he is able to be.” Since God is all good, God is not able to be non-good—that is, non-God—defective or evil. In other words, God is not omnipotent in the traditional metaphysical sense understood by Leibniz and Hegel. The Divine is not some being able to be all good and evil things. That is why God could not help Etty Hillesum and other victims of the Holocaust: God is not responsible for evil. And Hillesum understood this all too well when she turned the old hierarchies on their head and declared that it is we who must help God to be God.

Was Hillesum not in fact subscribing here to a long—if often neglected—biblical heritage? After all, if Elijah had not heard the “still small voice” of God in his cave, we would never have received the wisdom of his prophecy. If a young woman from Nazareth had said “no” to the angel of the Annunciation, the Word would not have become Flesh. If certain fishermen, tax collectors and prostitutes had not heard the call to follow the Son of Man, there would have been no Son of God—and no Gospel witness. So too, if Hillesum and others like her had not let God be God by defending the divine dwelling-place of caritas within them, even in the most hellish moments of the death-camps, there would have been no measure of love—albeit tiny as the mustard seed—to defy the hate of the Gestapo. For if God’s loving is indeed unconditional, the realization of that loving posse in this world is conditional upon our response. If we are waiting for God, God is waiting for us. Waiting for us to say "yes"—to hear the call and to act, to bear witness, to answer the posse with ease, to make the word flesh—even in the darkest moments.

I think Dionysius the Areopagite could be said to add to our understanding of this great enigma when he speaks, in book 7 of the Divine Names, of a "possibility beyond being" (huperousias dunameos) which engenders our desire to live more abundantly and seek the good. "Being itself," he writes, "only has the possibility to be from the possibility beyond being." And he adds that it is "from the infinitely good posse (dunamis) of what it sends to them (that) they have received their power (dunamis)." I am tempted to relate this notion of an infinitely good posse of God to another extraordinary passage in the Divine Names—this time book 9, section 3—where Dionysius writes of the God of little things:

God is said to be small as leaving every mass and distance behind and proceeding unhindered through all. Indeed the small is the cause of all the clements, for you will find none of these that have not participated in the form of smallness. Thus, smallness is to be interpreted with respect to God as its wandering and operating in all and through all without hindrance "penetrating down to the division of the soul, spirit, joint and marrow," and discerning thoughts and "intentions of the heart," and indeed of all beings. "For there is no creation which is invisible to its face" (Hebrews 4:12). This smallness is without quantity, without quality, without restraint, unlimited, undefined, and all embracing although it is unembraced.

Is this extraordinary passage by Dionysius not a passionate invitation to embrace a microtheology of the Kingdom? Is it not a solicitation to embrace an eschatology of little things—mustard seeds, grains of yeast, tiny pearls, cups of water, infinitesimal everyday acts of love and witness? It appears so.

Moreover, I think it is just this kind of microtheology that Gerard Manley Hopkins had in mind in "Pied Beauty." He records God's grace in small and scattered epiphanies of the quotidian when he speaks of "dappled things" from "finches' wings" and "rose-moles all in stipple upon trout that swim," to

All things counter, original, spare, strange; Whatever is fickle, freckled (who knows how?)

For Hopkins, it is not the mighty and triumphant monarch that epitomizes the pearl of the Kingdom ("immortal diamond") but, contrarily, the court fool, the joker in the pack, the least and last of these. Here is Hopkins's take on the eschatological kingdom:

In a flash, at a trumpet crash,
I am all at once what Christ is, since he was what I am, and
This Jack, joker, poor polisher, patch, matchwood, immortal diamond,
Is immortal diamond.
Re-imagining God

Hopkins’s deity is one of transfiguration rather than coercion, of posse rather than power, of little rather than large things. But in our shift of registers from theology to poetry we are already embarking on our next circle of readings.

The Literary Circle

In our third and final hermeneutic circle—the literary—I include a number of passages which offer more explicitly poetic epiphanies of the possible. This amplification of our investigation to embrace a literary poetics extends the range of reference to take in soundings of posse which transcend the confessional limits of theism or atheism, enjoying as they do a special liberty of imagination—a poetic license to entertain an unlimited variation of experience. As Emily Dickinson rightly observed, “possibility is a fuse lit by imagination,” a belief which informs her imaging of the eschatological possible.

Rabelais had his eye on a similar paradise when he affirmed the possibility of life through death, yea-saying to his last moments as he jubilantly declared: “J’avance vers le grand possible!” In his remarkable novel, A Man without Qualities, the Austrian writer Robert Musil offers a further perspective on the eschatological posse when he claims that “possibility is the dormant design of God in man”—a design waiting to be awakened by our poetic dwelling in the world. Our true vocation in history, for Musil, is one of utopian invention. It involves an audacious surpassing of given reality toward imagined possibility. Here is the passage in full:

One might define the meaning of the possible as the faculty of thinking all that might be just as much as what is . . . . The implications of such a creative disposition are huge . . . . The possible consists of much more than the dreams of neurotics; it also involves the still dormant plans of God. A possible event or truth is not just the real event or truth minus the ‘reality’; rather it signals something very divine, a flame, a burning, a will to construct a utopia which, far from fearing reality, treats it simply as a perpetual task and invention. The earth is not so spent, after all, and never has it seemed so fascinating.

The metaphor of fire—with its allusions to both the burning bush and the Pentecostal flame of speaking tongues—is also explored by Wallace Stevens in a poem addressed to George Santayana entitled, “To an Old Philosopher in Rome.” Here again the correspondence between the simple (indigent, small, inconsequential) and the eschatological (the Kingdom) is conveyed by the figure of a candle flame which illumines the real in the light of the “cestial possible.” The pneumatological call to speak in tongues commits itself here to a poetics of the poor and unremembered.

But it is doubtless Rainer Maria Rilke who composes one of the most inspiring invocations of the gracious power of posse, in the conclusion to his
Richard Kearney

_Letters to a Young Poet._ Here the eschatological promise of a coming God is combined with the erotic expectancy of a waiting lover. He asks his youthful correspondent,

Why don’t you think of him [God] as the one who is coming, one who has been approaching from all eternity, the one who will someday arrive, the ultimate fruit of a tree whose leaves we are? What keeps you from projecting his birth into the ages that are coming into existence, and living your life as a painful and lovely day in the history of a great pregnancy? Don’t you see how everything that happens is again and again a beginning, and couldn’t it be His [God’s] beginning, since, in itself, starting is always so beautiful?

Then Rilke poses this crucial question:

If he is the most perfect one, must not what is less perfect precede him, so that he can choose himself out of fullness and superabundance?—Must not he be the last one, so that he can include everything in himself, and what meaning would we have if he whom we are longing for has already existed? As bees gather honey, so we collect what is sweetest out of all things and build Him.

Rilke ends this remarkable passage with a call to vigilant attention and expectancy. Messianism at its best. The metaphor of the flowering, flourishing mustard seed is brought to a new poetic intensity. “Be patient,” he counsels the young poet, “and realize that the least we can do is to make coming into existence no more difficult for Him [God] than the earth does for spring when it wants to come.”

Here we might look to the “pregnant sense of the possible” in Kierkegaard—the interweaving of the divine and the human in patient prayer and longing. And this eschatological desire, as Rilke vividly reminds us, is not confined to human existence but involves, by extension, the entire expanse of the terrestrial universe as it awaits, yearns and prepares itself for the coming _prima vera._

My daughter, who brought this Rilke passage to my attention, told me this was a God she could believe in! Could I object?

So much depends, then, on what we mean by the _possible_. If one defines possibility according to established convention as a category of modal logic or metaphysical calculus—then God is closer to the impossible than the possible. But if one seeks, as I do, to reinterpret the possible as eschatological _posse_, from a postmetaphysical poetical perspective, the stakes are very different. For now we are talking of a _second possible_ (analogous to Ricoeur’s “second naïveté”) _beyond_ the impossible, _otherwise_ than impossible, _more_ than impossible, at the _other side_ of the old modal opposition between the possible and the impossible. And here we find ourselves closer to the Kierkegaard's "passion for the possible" as the portal to faith.
Re-imagining God

I think it is crucial to recall, here, the telling distinction between two competing translations of the Greek term dynamis. On the one hand, we have the metaphysical rendering of the term as potestas/potentia, that is, as a potency understood in terms of an economy of power, causality, substance—what Levinas calls the economy of the Same (or Totality). On the other hand, we have an eschatological rendering of dynamis as posse/possess, that is, as a gracious and gratuitous giving which possibility of love and justice in this world. It is this later interpretation of dynamis that I have been seeking to promote in my own hermeneutic detours through the poetics of the possible (and, in more depth and detail in The God Who May Be, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2001).

In triumphalist accounts of the Kingdom, the advent of the Messiah on the last day is often described in militaristic terms—as sublimely apocalyptic rather than lovingly vulnerable, as almighty rather than solicitous, as coercive rather than caring. By contrast, the divine posse I am sponsoring here is more healing than judgmental, more disposed to accept "the least of these" than to meet out punishment and glory. If God can prevent evil from happening by recreating the historical past, as a theologian like Peter Damian once suggested, He is by implication a God of theodicy—namely, a God who has the power to decide whether history unfolds as good or evil. To me, this sounds like potestas rather than posse. A far cry from the divine power of the powerless Etty Hillesum invokes, when she summons us to help God to be God in the face of violence and war. A world away from the God of little things.

Sometimes I have been asked what would happen to the God of the Possible if we were to destroy the earth? How can God's promise of a kingdom on earth be fulfilled if there is no earth to come back to? What might be said of the existence of God in such a scenario? There are a few observations I would like to make here by way of conclusion, surmises which claim the poetic license of a free imaginative variation.

First, I would say that as eternally perduring and constant (that is, as faithful and attentive to us in each present moment), God would live on as an endless promise of love and justice. This would be so even if we fail or frustrate this covenant by denying its potential for historical fulfillment on earth. In this case, God would be like a spouse abandoned by a spouse—to take up the bride/bridegroom analogy from the Song of Songs. A lover forsaken. Or to borrow a metaphor from Hildegard of Bingen, the posse would be like a tree deprived of its greening (viriditas). If denied its ultimate incarnation in the last days, the possible God would be like a flowering seed arrested before it could come to its full flourishing and fruition on the earth. It would still be adventus), but no longer futurus. The divine advent would be deprived of an historical, human future but would remain, in each moment, enduringly faithful in spite of all. It would still be a “yes” in the face of our “no.”

Second, as eternal memory (past), the divine posse would preserve all those eschatological “moments” from the past where the divine was incarnated in the flesh of the world every time (as Christ and Isaiah taught) someone gave a cup of cold water to someone else. In kaiological as opposed to merely chronological time, these instants would be eternally “repeated” in divine remembrance. This would mark a revaluation of a line from Shakespeare’s Julius Caesar, such that the good that men do lives after them—the evil is interred with their bones. It would be in keeping with the repeated assurances of the biblical deity to remember the faithful who lived and died in history, for example: “Can a mother forget her infant, be without tenderness for the child of her womb? Even should she forget, I will never forget you” (Isaiah 49:14–15). And it would also be consonant with the contrary commitment to erase the memory of evil: “The Lord is close to the broken hearted / The Lord confronts the evildoers / To destroy remembrance of them from the earth” (Psalms 34:16–19). There is then a deeply eschatological character to the biblical injunction to “remember” (zakhor). And this character is what translates God’s mindfulness of creatures into a form of “anticipatory memory” (the term is Herbert Marcuse’s) which preserves a future for the past. As Psalm 105 tells us, “He remembers forever his covenant / which he made binding for a thousand generations / which he entered into with Abraham” (vv. 8–9). In other words, the promise made at the beginning of time is kept by the divine posse as an “eternal” remembrance of both the historical past and present right up to the parousia.

Thirdly and finally then, qua eternal advent (future), we might say that even though world annihilation would have deprived the divine posse of its future realization as a kingdom come on earth, we could not, by such an act of self-destruction, deprive God of the possibility of starting over again. Nothing good is impossible to God; and rebirth in the face of death is good. As in any nuptial promise or pledge, each partner can speak for him/herself only: God can only promise for God, not for us. We are entirely free to break off our part of the promise at any time. And if we do, if we engage in collective self-destruction (God forbidden), why should God not have a “second chance”? Is not posse, after all, the possibility of endless beginning?

Of course, the posse of the Kingdom is not just a promise for humanity as a universal community (to be reassembled as the mystical body of Christ on the last day, according to the patristic notion of anakopalaosis, recapitulation). Posse is also and equally a promise for each unique self whose singular good, but not evil, will be preserved eternally in the recollection of the deus adventus—like each glistening speck of dust in a comet’s tail or each glint of plankton in the nocturnal wake of a ship. But if we destroy the earth we also refuse the possibility of each of these recollected and resurrected selves return-
Re-imagining God

...to a "new heaven as new earth" on the last day. Such selves would return with posse—as part of the eternal promise—but without the esse of a Second Coming.

Several of the above remarks and conjectures find textual support, I believe, in the "Palestinian formula" of eschatological memory (eis anamēsein) prevalent in late Jewish and early Christian literature. The formula finds one of its earliest inscriptions in psalm 112, "the righteous will be for eternal remembrance" (v. 6); and again in psalms 37 and 69, where the memory of God refers not just to creatures remembering their Creator in rituals and liturgies, but also to the Creator recalling creatures, making the past present before God in a sort of eternal re-presentation which endures into the future and beyond. Likewise in Ecclesiastes we find the repeated prayer that God might mercifully remember his children. As the biblical commentator, Joachim Jeremias, observes, such remembrance is an effecting and creating event which is constantly fulfilling the eschatological covenant promise . . . When the sinner "is not to be remembered" at the resurrection, this means that he will have no part in it (Ps. Sol. 3:11). And when God no longer remembers sin, he forgets it (Jer. 31:34; Heb. 8:12; 10:17), this means that he forgives it. God's remembrance is always an action in mercy or judgment.11

The notion of eschatological memory is, as noted, also frequently witnessed in New Testament literature where it takes the form of a double "repetition"—looking to past and future simultaneously. In the Eucharistic formula—"do this in remembrance of me, eis tēn emēn anamēsein" (Luke 22:19 = 1 Corinthians 11:24)—the proper translation of the repetition-injunction, in keeping with the Palestinian memorial formula, is this: "Do this so that God may remember me."12 The appeal to divine memory during the Eucharistic sharing of bread and wine may be seen accordingly as an echo of the third benediction of the grace after Passover meal, which asks God to remember the Messiah—a benediction which is followed in turn with a petition for "the remembrance of all thy people": "May their remembrance come before thee, for rescue, goodness . . ."13 The remembrance of past suffering is thus tied to the hope for the advent of the parousia—for Jews the entry of the Messiah to Jerusalem; for Christians the return of Christ on the last day. The petition for repetition—in the kairos logical rather than chronos logical sense—maybe translated as: "God remembers the Messiah in that he causes the kingdom to break in by the parousia."14

This allusion to a bilateral temporality whereby divine memory recalls the past as future, is further evidenced in Paul's gloss on the Eucharistic remembrance formula: "For as often as you eat this bread and drink this cup, you proclaim the Lord's death until he comes, akhrī ou elēthēi" (1 Corinthians 11:23–26). Indeed the use of the subjunctive term akhrī refers often in the New Testament to the arrival of the eschaton (Romans 11:25; 1 Corinthians 15:26; Luke 21:24). The crucial phrase here—"until he comes"—may thus be read in light of the liturgical maranatha (Come, Lord!) invoked by the faithful in their prayers for the coming of God. So rather than remembering the death of God as no more than a historical event of the past, the remembrance formula can be said to celebrate it as an eschatological advent—that is, as the inauguration of a New Covenant.

This proclamation expresses the vicarious death of Jesus as the beginning of the salvation time and prays for the coming of the consummation. As often as the death of the Lord is proclaimed at the Lord's supper, and the maranatha rises upwards, God is reminded of the unfulfilled climax of the work of salvation until [the goal is reached, that] he comes. Paul has therefore understood the anamnesis as the eschatological remembrance of God that is to be realized in the parousia.15

It is with this in mind that Luke speaks of the eschatological jubilation and "gladness" (agalliasis) which characterizes the mealtimes of the earliest Christian communities (Acts 2:46).

In sum, the close rapport between the Eucharistic request for repetition and the Passover ritual, suggest that for both Judaism and Christianity the Kingdom advent is construed as a retrieval-forward of the past as future. The remembrance formula might be interpreted accordingly as something like this: "Keep gathering together in remembrance of me so that I will remember you by keeping my promise to bring about the consummation of love, justice and joy in the parousia. Help me to be God!" Or as the Coptic version of the formula goes: "May the Lord come . . . If any man is holy, let him come. Maranatha. Amen."

The above conjectures operate, for the most part, in the realm of hermeneutical poetics which enjoys a certain imaginative liberty vis-à-vis the strictures of theological dogma, speculative metaphysics and empirical physics. Though, I hasten to add, a fruitful dialogue remains open with all three disciplines.

Let me end with a final eschatological image from the poetics of the Kingdom—the invitation to the feast. "I stand at the door and knock, says the Lord. If anyone hears my voice and opens the door, I will come in and sit down to supper with him, and he with me." The great thing about this promise of an eschatological banquet is that no one is excluded. The Post-God of posse knocks not just twice but a thousand times—nay, infinitely, ceaselessly—until there is no door unopened, no creature, however small or inconsequential, left out in the cold, hungry, thirsty, uncared for, unloved, unredeemed. The Post-God keeps knocking and calling and delivering the word until we open ourselves to the message and the letter becomes spirit, the word flesh. And what is this message? An invitation to the Kingdom. And what is the Kingdom? The Kingdom is a cup of cold water given to the least of these, it is bread and fishes and wine given to the famished and un-housed, a good meal and (we are promised) one hell of a good time lasting into the early hours of the morning. A morning that never ends.
Re-imagining God

NOTES

2. The Torah: With Rashi's Commentary (New York: Mesorah, 1997). It would be interesting to relate Rashi's rabbinic interpretation with Isaac Luria's kabbalistic reading of God in terms of a generous withholding, or "withdrawal" (nimshum), which invites human creatures to subsequently retrieve and reanimate the fragments of the "broken vessels" of divine love which lie scattered like tiny seeds throughout the created universe. This reading, which exerted a deep influence on Hassidic thinkers as well as on philosophers like Simone Weil, seems to confirm my account of God's refusal to impose himself on creation—as some kind of omnipotent fulfilled being (ipsum esse subsistens), sufficient reason, or supreme cause (causa sui)—preferring to relate to humans in the realm of the "possible," rather than the purely "actual" or "necessary." I am grateful to my Boston College colleague, Monty Cohen, for bringing the insights of the Lurianic kabbalah to my attention; see in particular his article "Sanhedrin's Harp," Parabola 22/3: pp. 38–41.

4. Nicholas of Cusa, Trialogus de Posse, in J. Hopkins, A Concise Introduction to the Philosophy of Nicholas of Cusa (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1978), p. 69. The original Latin is: Deus est omne id quod esse potest.

6. Ibid., p. 188. For a further exploration of the link between negative theology and micro-eschatology, see Stanislas Breton, The Word and the Cross, trans. Jacquelyn Porter (New York: Fordham University Press, 2002), pp. 8–11, 49–50, 60–70, 80–91, 112–114. See in particular Breton's radical claim that we must give to God the being he has not, qua thrusting, kenotic, crucified stranger (pp. 121–122). The dynamis of God is here identified with the gennum nihil or "power of nothing" which reveals itself as a "double nothingness" and powerlessness which liberates those oppressed by the power of to be, sowing the seed of nonbeing epitomized by the Beatitudes so that the eschatological tree of love and justice may flower and flourish (pp. 80–84, xxiv–xxvi). For it is in and as a "seed of nonbeing" that, in Ekhnat's resonant phrase, "God becomes verdant in all the honor of his being" (cit. p. 80). (See also here Hildegard of Bingen's notion of divine "greening" or virtuditas, n. 9, below.) A more postmodern take on this notion of a micro-eschatology is hinted at by Slavoj Žižek in Fragile Absolute, or, Why Is the Christian Legacy Worth Fighting For? He writes, "The ultimate mystery of love is that incompleteness is a way higher than completion . . . Perhaps the true achievement of Christianity is to elevate a loving (imperfect) Being to the place of God—that is, of ultimate perfection" (emphasis in original; London: Verso, 2000, pp. 146–147).

the Comfort of the Resurrection”; see the illuminating reading of Hopkins in Mark Patrick Hederman, Anchoring the Altar: Christianity and the Work of Art (Dublin: Veritas, 2002), p. 131ff. It is important to note that this microtheological emphasis on God as less rather than more is not confined to the Judeo-Christian tradition. It is also to be found in much of the Hindu and Buddhist wisdom literature; see for instance the following passage from Krishnamurti: “The silence which is not the silence of the ending of noise is only a small beginning. It is like going through a small hole to an enormous, wide, expansive ocean, to an immeasurable, timeless state” (Freedom from the Known, San Francisco: Harper, 1969, p. 109). Interestingly, one of the siddhis—the powers that a yogin/yogini may acquire—is to become as small as an atom.

The Taoist master Lao Tse spoke from a similar perspective in Tao Te Ching when he wrote:

Know the high
But keep to the low;
Become a valley
To all under heaven.
As a valley provides in abundance,
Give in constant Virtue;
Return to natural simplicity. (chap. 28)

Or again when he wrote:

The Great Way flows everywhere . . .
It clothes and feeds all things,
Yet does not claim
To be their lord.
It asks for nothing in return.
It may be called the Small . . .
So too the wise may become great,
By becoming small. (chap. 44)

9. Rainer Maria Rilke, Letters to a Young Poet, trans. Stephen Mitchell (New York: Vintage, 1986), pp. 51–63. The emphasis here on the earth as correspondent for divine eros highlights, once again, the incarnational tendency of the eroticism. The earth is full of the seeds of the divine (what Augustine called rationes seminales, borrowing from the Stoics’ logos spermaikoi), incubating within the finite historical world like latent potencies waiting to be animated and actualized by the infinitely incoming grace of God as transcendent posse. If one removes transcendent posse from this equation, one relapses into a purely immanentist dialectic (evolutionary materialism or, at best, process theology). On the other hand, if one ignores the immanence of terrestrial and human potencies, one is left with an inordinately inaccessible and abstract deity—a sort of ascetic alterity without face or voice (e.g., deism or deconstruction). A hermeneutical poetics of divine posse tries to preserve a delicate balance between these opposite extremes.
10. I am grateful to my wise friend and teacher, Peggy McLoughlin, for this reference and the quotes below. Here is one verse in which the term viriditas appears (from Translations of Hildegard at www.scot-art.org/scmc/txm.htm):
Re-imagining God

O most noble greening power (O nobilissima viriditas)
Rooted in the sun,
Who shine in dazzling serenity
In a sphere
That no earthly excellence
Can comprehend.
You are enclosed
In the embrace of divine mysteries,
You blush like the dawn
And burn like a flame of the sun.

And a general comment on viriditas in Hildegard:

For her, the energy that drives the universe—which she calls viriditas, or the greening force—is also the power of the Living Light, which is Love-erites. The expression of this in the creation is music. The original creation was a miracle of equilibrium, of perfect harmony, which the Fall disturbed; the incarnation restores a new harmony—indeed the Word of God is music itself, and the soul of mankind is symphonic: symphonta tis est anima . . . Here she finds the dynamic expression of the love of God and his promise to bring mankind back to him, the expression in the body of the green-growing grace of viriditas. 14. Jeremias, Eucharistic Words, p. 252. One might see a repetition of this eschatological forgetting and remembering from the finite human perspective, in Dante. In canto 28 of the Purgatorio the pilgrim encounters the two inexhaustible streams of the garden, Lethe and Eunoe, of which the former washes away all memory of sin while the latter retrieves the memory of good deeds and life-giving moments (ll. 121–144).
